

Emotional intelligence - why is it worth sending employees to Stress and Emotion Management training?

A company that invests in stress and emotion management skills among its employees achieves an advantage in effectiveness and efficiency. Our mind has limited operational space - when it is filled with difficult emotions, there is no room for analysis, drawing conclusions and making the best decisions for the company.

We especially recommend strengthening emotional intelligence for employees who:

- manage a team/processes - the pressure of operating at the intersection of two points of view and expectations (management - team) often gives rise to difficult emotions, e.g. anger, helplessness, frustration
- have contact with clients or contractors - dealing with emotions, frustrations and expectations of clients/contractors, with emphasis on taking care of the company's image and controlling their own emotions and reactions
- their position requires making numerous key decisions - people in management positions associated with great responsibility
- they work creatively; their work is subject to constant evaluation or the effects of actions are visible later - uncertainty of the results of actions taken and meeting the expectations of others may lead to frustration and burnout
- perform repetitive, monotonous tasks - daily routine can lead to frustration and burnout
- they easily become angry, irritated, or sad in the workplace - which may reduce job satisfaction among co-workers
- they perform risky work - the awareness of great responsibility can sometimes be paralyzing and cause severe stress

An employee with developed emotional intelligence:

- strives to achieve strategic goals for the company, managing to take necessary risks and proactively approaching difficulties
- takes responsibility for the tasks entrusted to him and his team because he looks for solutions and treats problems as challenges
- can cope with difficult emotions in stressful situations (e.g. during a presentation, conversation with a difficult client, commercial negotiations)
- maintains more peace and freedom in relationships with clients/contractors and colleagues - even in... can think and act rationally in the "hottest" moments
- is an important link that brings the team together - he is able to respond empathetically to the emotions of others, without taking them on himself
- communicates his emotions and needs in an open and constructive way, thanks to which his behavior is "readable" to the environment and cooperation with him is more effective
- looks for benefits and positives instead of focusing only on problems and risks - it can be a good ambassador of changes in the organization
- it is more effective and therefore more reliable in operation
- builds a positive image of the company he works for - through his composure, solution-seeking attitude and optimism
